contemplated to effect, that the two or three states at most could not maintain that conclusion. The other states are generally convinced that it will not be to the interest of most of them, and that we will not be able to maintain our right. It will be to the interest of each state to say, if it will not be of the benefit of the people, that it will not he of consequence to them. I think the people in these states will not be much inclined to make any opposition to the people of these states. I think they will not be much inclined to make any opposition to the people of these states.
